Rodney & Greg, do you agree with my answers? Please amend as necessary if you think I'm inaccurate or could be more clear.

Here is what I'd like to know from the trainer:
-What are SPD officers trained to do once a suspect is in handcuffs on the ground?
Any force used by an officer must be justifiable and objectively reasonable based on the totality of circumstances. There are instances in which a restrained person can still be a threat to either themselves or others and there are instances in which a person must be further subdued while on the ground. There are a myriad of situations in which this could occur so it is not possible to generalize what an appropriate police response would be; it all depends.
-If an officer must use a part of their body to subdue a suspect on the ground, what is the proper way to do that? Once again, the circumstances dictate what an appropriate amount of force would be. For example, if a 120 pound officer is trying to restrain a 240 suspect who is being violent and aggressive then that officer's response would be quite different than a 240 pound officer restraining a 120 pound suspect. Again, any force used must be objectively reasonable based on the totality of circumstances.
-How are SPD officers taught to ensure a suspect's safety when they are being subdued?
Officers are taught to use the minimal amount of force necessary to make an arrest. Once a scene is secure, officers shall ensure proper medical treatment is provided to any person who has visible injuries, complaints of injury or otherwise requests medical attention. When medical treatment is needed beyond immediate first aid, we call for SFD to treat the patient.

Subject: Questions

Hi Cpl. Willhite,

Thanks for your help on this matter. I know you and the chief have a thin line to walk between transparency and jeopardizing an investigation, and I truly appreciate your willingness to consider the questions that I think many people in the community have today.

Here is what I'd like to know from the trainer:
-What are SPD officers trained to do once a suspect is in handcuffs on the ground?
-If an officer must use a part of their body to subdue a suspect on the ground, what is the proper way to do that?
-How are SPD officers taught to ensure a suspect's safety when they are being subdued?

Also, I would like a copy of SPD's use of force and social media policies.

Thank you again,

Jamie
